Christmas traditions and customs in England

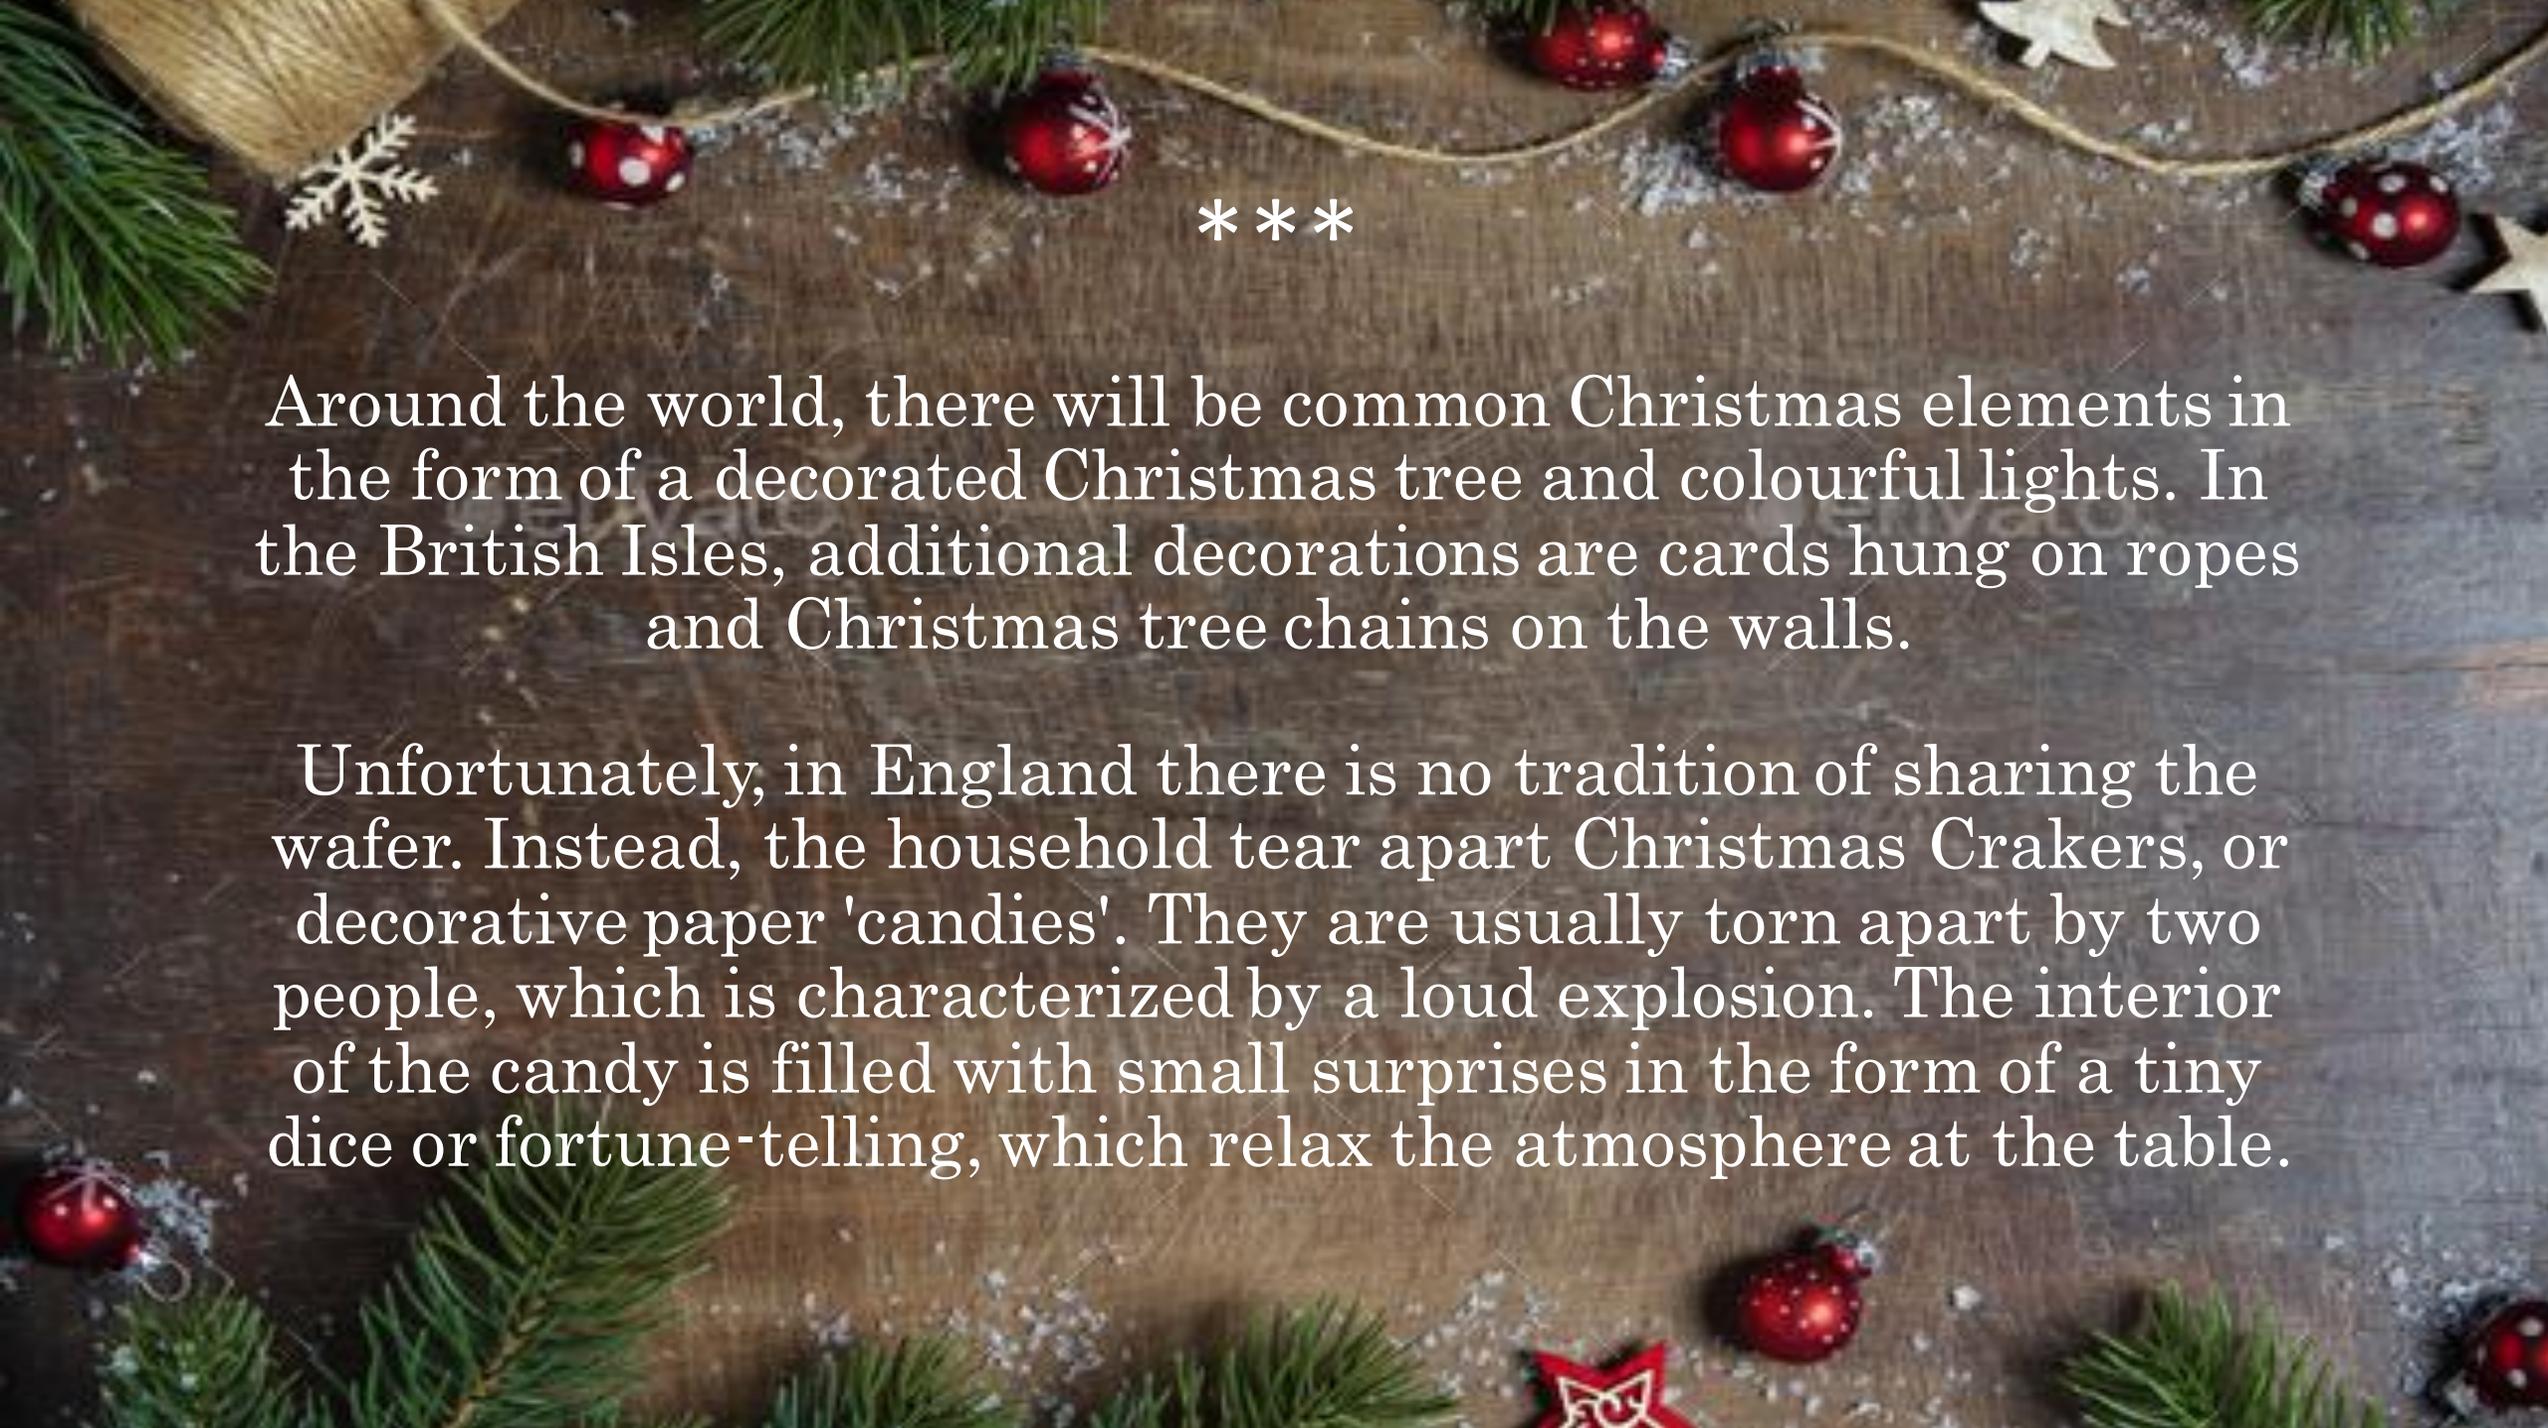

| Christmas traditions and customs in England |

The English don't celebrate Christmas Eve, but they do celebrate "Boxing Day", which falls on December 26. This custom dates to the Middle Ages, when the church gave away money from piggy banks to the poor. Present's put into previously prepared large socks. The English often leave a glass of alcohol for St. Santa Claus and a carrot for the reindeer.

In England, everyone left by St. Santa's gift is properly celebrated by the recipient. Each of the gifts is unpacked individually, and the members of the household around it take only the loud "oh" and "ah". After unwrapping a few presents, a tea break is set before the family resumes its ritual.

On Christmas Day, the English eat their meals in crones made of paper. It is a symbol referring to the Magi. The dishes include turkey stuffed with various vegetables. It is also accompanied by sausages wrapped in bacon. For dessert, the famous pudding is prepared, which is served with custard or brandy. Traditionally, if someone wants to eat a pudding with a little alcohol, it is set on fire to deter all misfortunes.

Around the world, there will be common Christmas elements in the form of a decorated Christmas tree and colourful lights. In the British Isles, additional decorations are cards hung on ropes and Christmas tree chains on the walls.

Unfortunately, in England there is no tradition of sharing the wafer. Instead, the household tear apart Christmas Crakers, or decorative paper 'candies'. They are usually torn apart by two people, which is characterized by a loud explosion. The interior of the candy is filled with small surprises in the form of a tiny dice or fortune-telling, which relax the atmosphere at the table.

*What about the new

 New year in England **

In London, real crowds gather by the Thames near the London Eye to watch the fireworks launch as soon as Big Ben strikes midnight. It is also popular to sing the traditional Scottish song "Auld Lang Syne", during which singers cross their arms over their chests and join them with the hands of those standing nearby. This song is meant to remind you of old and new friends.

In England, at midnight the back door is opened (in the houses) to "let the old year out" and the first dark-haired man noticed is asked to enter through the front door, bringing with him bread (symbolizing food), salt (symbolizing money) and carbon (symbolizing heat).
